The Ashfield Flood

The Calumity Foreboded in Romance.

From the Lancaster Gazette.

A well worn proverb says that truth is stranger than fiction, but fiction sometimes strangely anticipates truth.

Our telegraph columns describe the fearful destruction of life and property occasioned by the bursting of a reservoir covering 150 acres of ground and thirty feet deep, a few miles from Haverhill, Mass. A similar disaster forms one of the most thrilling episodes of Charles Reade's novel, "Put Yourself in His Place." Only a dam had been weakened by frost, and the mill owner was advised to open the sluice of the water pipes and relieve the pressure.

"The embankment," the novelist tells us, "huge as it was, was not so high by several hundred feet as nature builds in parallel cases, and, beside the natural pressure of the water, the water, the upper surface of the lake was being driven by the wind against the upper or thin part of the embankment." The sluice pipes were opened with great effort, and the ground trembled violently, and the water as it rushed out of the pipes, roared like discharges of artillery.

It was thought that the danger had been averted, but soon a thin stream of water began "to stream down over the center of the embankment and trickle down. The quantity was nothing, but it alarmed him, the director of operations. Having no special knowledge of these matters, he was driven to comparisons. He had a boy and a girl, and a little dam in April, they would resist the streams until it trickled over them, and from that moment their fate was sealed." This thought filled him with alarm, and not without reason. A few minutes later "the water was pouring over the top, still in a thin sheet, but then that sheet was gradually widening. The rent above it enlarged and deepening at a fearful rate, the rent in the top of the embankment spread, deepened, yawned terrifically, and the pent up lake plunged through, and swept away at once the center embankment, rushed, roaring and hissing down the valley, an avalanche of water, swirling great rocks up by the roots and sweeping huge trees away, and driving them, like rocks, for miles."

The Massachusetts disaster did not occur from precisely the same circumstances as that imagined by the English novelist, but its general occasion was the same—the inability of the walls to resist the pressure of the water. The effect, however, was singularly alike, as will be seen by the following paragraphs, quoted from a large description so interwoven with the plot of the story as not to be susceptible of reproduction unaltered:

"At an appalling sound, that hissing thunder, the walls which he had never heard before, and hopes never to hear again, Ransome sprang away at all his speed, and warned the rest of the village with loud, articulate cries; he would not wait to speak, nor was it necessary. At the top of the hill he turned a moment, and looked up the valley; soon he saw a lofty wall, which he called upon Hatfield mill it struck the mill, and left nothing visible but the roof surrounded by white foam. Another moment and he distinctly saw the mill leave a yard or two, then disappear and swim no trace, and on came the white wall, hissing and thundering. Ransome uttered a cry of horror, and galloped madly forward to save what lives he might. As he galloped along his mind would spread and lose some of that tremendous volume and force before which he had seen Hatfield stone mill go down. With this hope he galloped on, and reached Pome Bridge. Five miles from the reservoir. Here, to his dismay, he heard the hissing, thundering sound as near to him as when he halted on the hill above Dambank, but he could see nothing, owing to a turn in the valley. The wall dashed across

The Duke of Brunswick's Jewels

At Auction.

Many of the jewels which belonged to the late Duke of Brunswick, have just been sold at Geneva.

The auction lasted a week, and the total amount realized was 900,000 francs, for gems of which the previously estimated value was 788,568 francs.

On the third day of the sale a marked decline set in, which went on increasing until the sale may be said to have actually died out for want of bidders.

Several lots were withdrawn, because the upset price was not offered for them. Among the chief articles disposed of were the toilet service in gilt silver of the late Duke, secured by bank of about 20 small rubies; a rose brilliant of great beauty, for 18,000 francs; and a pure brilliant for 37,100 francs, bought by M. Scheelezinger, of Vienna; four rubies for 13,700 francs; and a blue brilliant, 17,000 francs; and a large emerald, 10,000 francs, by Baron L. A. Goldschmidt and M. Porges; a lot of tinted diamonds, 45,200 francs; a heart-shaped brilliant, 10,100 francs; and four brilliant, 13,000 francs. An incident of the auction was a sale of the discovery that certain "villains" put up were imitations, and their consequent withdrawal.

Among the buyers were representatives of the Shah of Persia—Messrs. Sabot & Tovianin, of Teheran—but their purchases were confined to a collection of about 20 small rubies, worth 10,000 francs, some emeralds of small price, and a few other trifles. The large and beautiful rose-tinted brilliant, the property of the collection, was sold to Messrs. Blogg & Martin for 70,600 francs.

Penalties of Public Stagers.

A fact little known to the public regarding the singing voice is, that all vocalists "thin" in the chronic state of inflammation, or an approach to it, which would be considered downright soreness by anybody else. A friend of mine, who is a prima donna, goes through life with a pair of red swollen tonsils which would serve me very nicely for the quincy. Familiarity with the condition has made me a proverb teacher, for the abnormally enlarged tonsils create no disturbance in my friend's mind. She remarks that a physician who was unacquainted with artists' throats would send her to bed if he got a throat at hers. But it is seldom necessary to caution the possessor of a singing voice of the danger of the chronic state of inflammation, or an approach to it; it is too precious a possession to be lightly guarded. A voice which in the money sense is equivalent to a row of brown stone fronts in Fifth avenue, or I know not how many oil wells in Pennsylvania, will be treated with the utmost respect by a wise possessor. Unfortunately, the singing voice is short lived; if it is used. The exactions of modern opera are so destructive in their effects, that it is calculated the average duration of freshness of a soprano voice is eight years, and of a tenor voice only six years. The baritone will generally last a lifetime; though there are well-known instances of once celebrated basses who still walk the earth in their many physical vigor, but sing no more.—The Galaxy for June.

A Dental Rehearsal.

"We know a young man in his country," says the Walla Walla, W. T. Union, "who writes a story, and having, to his own satisfaction, mastered the science of medicine and surgery, has concluded to turn his attention to practical dentistry. In order to enable him to pull teeth without pain, he procured the head of a sheep that had been slaughtered, and repaired to the street, and, after a few minutes' study, he concluded, as he supposed, from prying eyes, he produced his forceps, gently smoothed the sheep's face with his hand, probably to inspire the patient with confidence, then opened his mouth, laid firmly hold of a molar with his 'tooth-hooks,' and gave a surge that brought out the tooth. He then stepped back, wiped his forceps on the neck of his pants, and said, in the most soothing tones: 'Madame, did it hurt you?' A man who was fishing in the creek, not twenty feet away, didn't hear what the sheep said."

Quix had a call from one of his friends and hospitably offered him a glass of wine, and, after drinking, he would have a little water. "No," said the visitor, "I don't understand you. Here, Mr. Author, give me your conception to its complete shade; my part, I couldn't write it—our talents supplement each other."
